„Not without civil society – Cooperation India-Germany on Energies in Transformation“

Both, the German and Indian governments, have agreed a "strategic partnership" which will focus on energies in transformation (i.e. renewable) and climate change as well.

In Germany, the history of energies in transformation is inextricably linked with a politically active civil society. In India, however, civil society involvement, critical studies and political statements against current government plans to increase the use of coal energy are sometimes prosecuted. In addition, mainly large companies are active in the field of energies in transition.

How does that fit into the partnership?

Is civil society participation in India even an aspect for the German side?

Our colleagues from the Indian civil society stress the importance that they may directly be involved from the beginning into programming and planning of the partnership on energies in transition.

The one day conference will explore opportunities for civil society involvement within the bilateral cooperation. The conference is online and held in English language. Our colleagues and further participants from India are also connected online.

You're invited to join.

The Academy is an institution of the Protestant Church, but does not seek to lay down specific rules on religious beliefs.

In fact, the Academy encourages discussion of controversial issues, as well as the awareness and acceptance of differing points of view.

Since it was founded in 1945, the Academy has continuously provided a forum for intellectual, intercultural and ecumenical exchange.

TARGET GROUPS

Civil Society Organizations working in and about the region; staff of development and relief agencies, foundations; staff and volunteers working in the development context and alternative energies.
